Webpossible worlds. In order to avoid the conclusion that everything that exists is necessary, or that all possibles are actual, as Spinoza held, Leibniz argued that not all possible substances are compossible, that is, capable of coexisting. In Leibniz's view, the compossibility relation divides all possible substances into disjoint sets, each Webjustifies the postulation of one actual world (heretofore referred to as AW) and of many (perhaps an infinity) of non-actual or alternate possible worlds (APWs, or short PWs) where things are different. In addition to the contrast between one actual world and many merely possible ones, modal logic uses a concept of accessibility.
